Did you know?

Did you know that your TV has settings and that you can change them now, or later in Settings?

How your TV uses location: You can allow apps and services to use your TV's location. Google may also collect and use location data to help provide and improve services that use location.

How your TV can help make other TVs and Google services better: You've probably noticed that apps sometimes crash or stop working. You can allow your TV to send information about how it's working to Google, so Google can diagnose problems and fix them for you and other people. Google may also let app developers know about these problems. If you're logged in and have the Web & App Activity setting turned on, the data may also be saved to your account.

If you are logged in to your Google account, on the next screen you can choose which apps you want to install on your device.

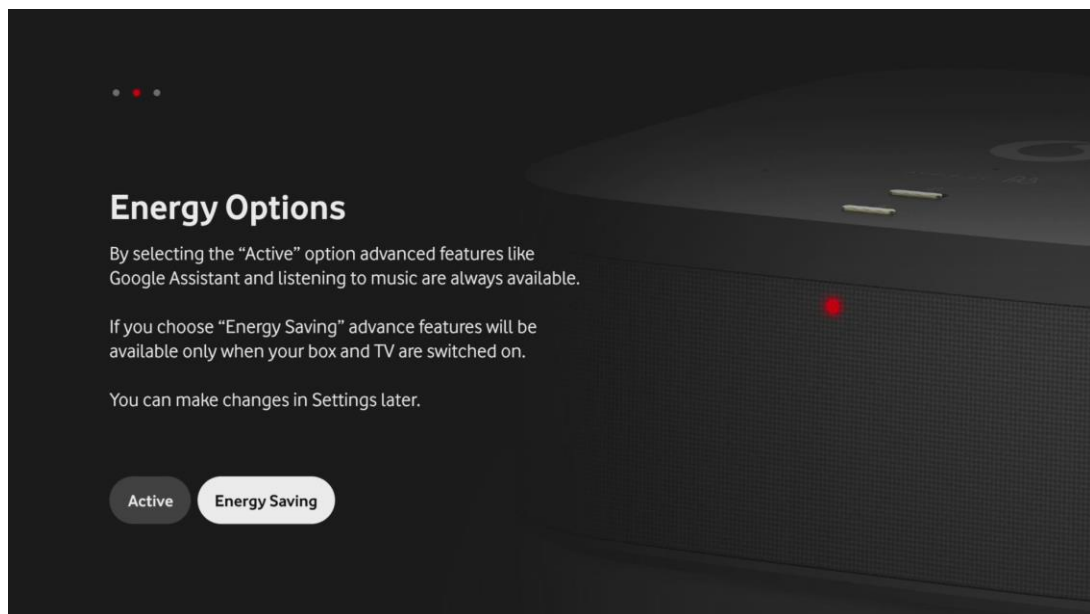

Now we click through the device control information.

At this point, the setup of the device itself is complete and all that remains is to set up the TV app itself.

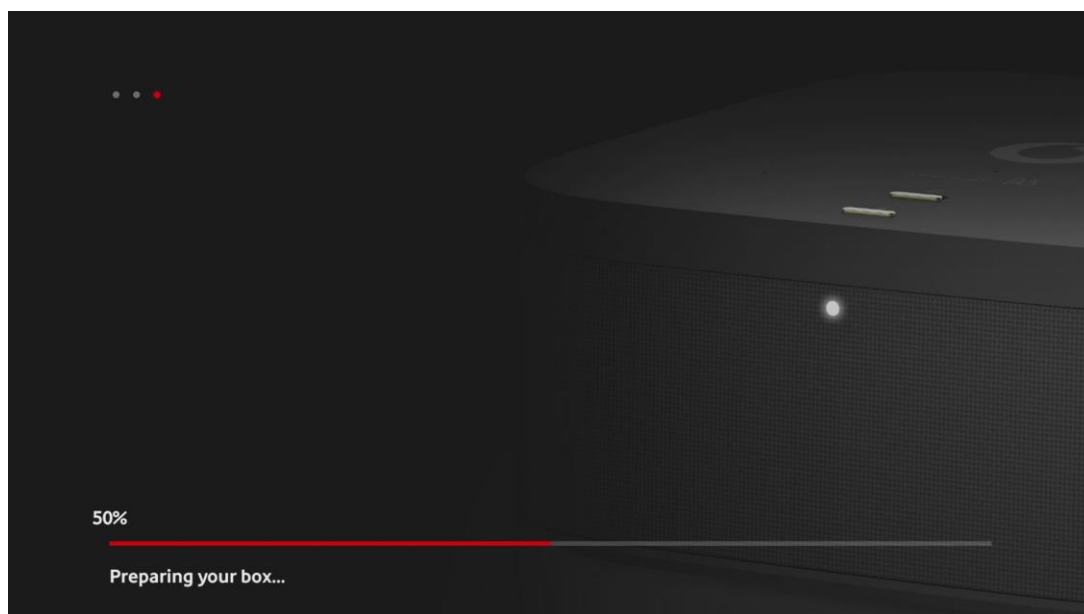

First of all, you need to agree to the Automatic recording option, which allows you to use the backward viewing of programs.

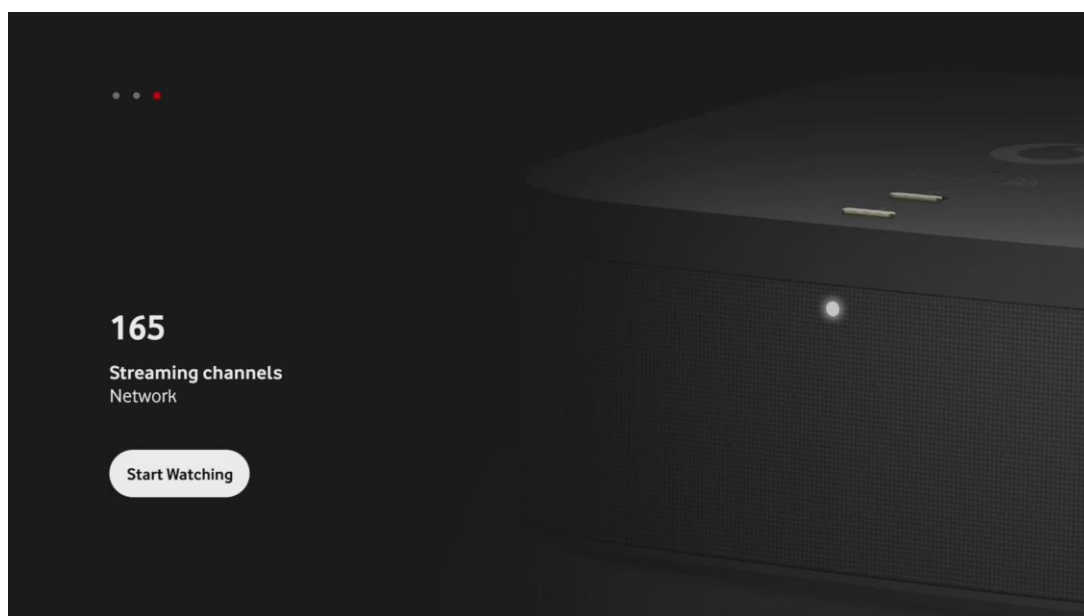

In the next option, you choose whether you want the set-top box to be constantly active, or whether you prefer to save energy and select power saving mode.

---

At this moment, channel tuning, settings and any final device updates are in progress.

The device is ready to use, just confirm “Start Watching”.
